The Statue of Liberty as seen today

Introduction

The Statue of Liberty is the tallest statue in the United States. It can be seen from far away. Where did such a big statue come from?

Edouard de Laboulaye, the Frenchman who came up with the idea of the Statue of Liberty

A Gift from France

In 1865, a man in France wanted to help America celebrate its 100th birthday. He said France should give America a gift. The gift was the Statue of Liberty.

Liberty Island, near New York City

First, the United States and France found a place to put the statue. They decided to put it on an island near New York.

Building the Statue

The United States built the base for the statue. France built the statue itself. It had to look good and last a long time. The inside was made of iron. The outside was made of copper.

The finished statue in Paris, France, in 1884

The statue was put together, but it was too big to move in one piece. So it was taken apart again! The pieces were sent to America on a big ship.

A painting of the celebration in 1886

The statue was finally done in 1886.
The president of the United States spoke at a big celebration.

Big and Green

The Statue of Liberty now looks like a big green woman. It weighs as much as 115 cars. It is as tall as a 30-story building with the base.

The many colors of the copper on the statue

The statue started out the color of a new penny. Over the years, the air turned the copper green.

What the Statue Means

The Statue of Liberty is a work of art. It is also a sign of friendship. It has welcomed many people who have moved to the United States.

July 4, 1776, as it is written on the tablet in the ancient Roman system of numbers

The Statue of Liberty also has special meaning. The torch in its right hand stands for freedom. The tablet in its left hand has July 4, 1776, written on it. The United States became its own country on this date.
